Introduction

This programme is designed to enhance practitioners' ability to work in the globalising world and to challenge the traditional perspectives of globalisation. It will do this by developing a critical perspective on globalisation and a reflective and strategic practice. The characteristic feature of the programme will be a dialectic between students' personal experience and the conceptual resources of the programme. This means that the bodies of perspectives and theories, including many areas including the field of adult education, with which students will be brought into contact.

There is an emergent field of practice which concerns a global phenomenon; the learning dimension of practitioners and the way practitioners act on and construct their different contexts. This diverse group of practitioners faces new challenges, which accompany the accelerating globalisation of economy, society and culture. The impact of globalisation could be described in terms of economic shifts, in terms of new forms for communications and networking, the use of new technologies, working across differences etc. These challenges also include demands for greater effectiveness and productivity, and the complexities of furthering social justice and equity.

The contexts of learning are changing in response to globalisation and practitioners in different areas will face the impact of this. The learning dimension will become an important feature of many practitioners. Instability and change will be characteristic and constitute the incentives to look for new perspectives in order to cope with the unknown. The skills and qualities needed will be networking skills, the ability to work with people from other cultures. Another dimension is also to be able to work from a distance, to handle new communication forms and to promote virtual communities.

Adults learn in a diverse field of practice, with many specialisms; human resource development, health care education, community based adult education, vocational education, basic education, etc. Practitioners also perform a variety of roles, they are teachers, administrators, policy makers, facilitators of organisational learning and so forth. Other practitioners, e.g. managers, lawyers and engineers, also have a learning dimension to their work. They learn and teach in their daily practice, often informally and incidentally.

Purpose

The aim is to provide a high quality Master's degree in Adult Learning, which in both content and process gives students an insight into globalisation and cross-cultural collaboration.

The programme should also enhance the understanding of different contexts and provide experience of working in a variety of study modes.

Aim

Knowledge and understanding

- to encourage understanding of commonalities and differences across different contexts for adult learning
- to understand knowledge based societies and the implications for learning
- to develop understanding of the globalisation discourses
- to appreciate the historical context of present developments and link these to one's own sites of practice
- to challenge orthodoxies in adult learning theory and practice

Skills and abilities

- to learn to use teaching and learning technologies globally
- to learn how to learn and work globally

Values and attitudes

- to develop cultural sensibilities and sensitivities
- to adopt a multifaceted equity perspective on all issues of learning
- to engage in reframing of one's own professional practice
- to create networks of relationships across countries and help establish a global community of adult learning practitioners

Content

The programme consists of 8 courses. The first course of the programme introduces the structure of the programme and also aims to develop a number of skills that are central to the two years of the programme. The following four courses focus on different content themes or 'perspectives', designed to be relevant to students with different interests and backgrounds. Then, a course focusing on research methods is followed by a research project for those universities where an independent project is required for a Master's degree. Linköping University is one of these universities. In the last semester, a course is also taken to complete the common activities introduced in the first course of the programme.

The courses are listed below in chronological order:

- Locating oneself in Global Learning, part 1, 4,5 hp/ECTS
- Adult Learning: Perspectives and Contexts, 7,5 hp/ECTS
- Work and Learning, 7,5 hp/ECTS
- Fostering Learning in Practice, 7,5 hp/ ECTS
- Global/Local Learning, 7,5 hp/ECTS
- Understanding Research, 7,5 hp/ECTS
- Locating oneself in Global Learning, Part II, 3 hp/ECTS
- Researching Adult Learning: Project work, 15 hp/ECTS

The content, methods, learning goals and examinations of each course are described in separate curriculum.
